The invention relates to a combination of methods for the determination of a certain physiologically active agent in body fluids, and in particular to a combination of methods for the determination of cortisol in human blood serum, plasma, plasma derivatives and artificial or real body fluids. There has been a need for a relatively cheap and simple assay for the determination of cortisol in blood serum, plasma, plasma derivatives, and other body fluids. The prior art has employed a variety of immunochemical approaches for the determination of cortisol in human fluids, wherein a first antibody is directed against cortisol conjugated to a second antibody capable of binding to that first antibody. U.S. Pat. No. 4
