I have the following class that just stores something in an std::vector: class Foo{ public: std::vector< myVec; void add(std::pair); bool operator value){ myVec.push_back(value); } In this case my vector contains a set of Foo objects, and I want to know if there is an object whose value of myVec matches the std::string in a given Foo object. I started with an std::set, but, since I have to support insertions/deletions, this doesn't seem like a good solution. A: Given the STL implementation is C++11 compliant, std::set is probably what you want. (std::set has been around since the days of very early C++. I'd guess set was a C thing, as the syntax was inspired by C90. C++11 provides set, which is a template.) A: I don't believe there is a standard library function to do this. But you could implement it yourself using find. If you want to use an order relation of the objects in your vector as well, then you should look at std::map. The template will make it easy for you to specify the key and value and use std::find to find the given key. Then you just return the value from find. A: The same as std::set if you want to do the ordering also. The only issue that comes to mind is that you
