computer database through a two-way radio communications link. The invention is particularly suited for use in providing local access to various databases. Such local access is desirable for a number of reasons. First, the demand for local access to databases is very high for such things as emergency services, reference information, real time information, weather information, and the like. It is also desirable to provide local access to a database for police, fire, and ambulance personnel in order to assist such personnel in emergencies, to access a database for information purposes for purposes of enhanced productivity, to access a database for system analysis for purposes of problem and feature determination and system improvement. It is also desirable to have local access to a database for purposes of sales and marketing. It is known in the prior art to provide local access to databases to subscribers who have a certain level of access. For example, police officers in certain cities may have access to the police department's database for reference purposes. Similarly, subscribers of health maintenance organizations have access to databases which may be used by emergency personnel to access a patient's information. It is desirable to provide such local access to databases to subscribers who have a legitimate need to access the database and who do not have an unauthorized or surreptitious need to access the database. One prior art system for providing local access to databases is the publicly-switched telephone network (PSTN). In such systems, a database is maintained at a central location and the database is accessed by subscribers by dialing a telephone number associated with the database. However, the subscriber must dial a telephone number in order to access the database. In many instances, the subscriber may have access to a twoway radio in addition to the telephone. For example
