Fibroblasts cultured at low density are replaced every 3 to 4 days, suggesting that these cells are not immortal and die after repeated divisions. Senescent cells were identified in various human tissues following extensive rounds of cell division, aging and genetic stress. Despite the importance of senescence in the development of age-related diseases, the molecular signatures which may define senescence in vivo are not clearly understood. Here, we describe a strategy to investigate these signatures. The gene expression profile of normal human fibroblasts was compared with the expression profiles of human fibroblasts in their first two, third, and fourth passage or in senescence. Using this approach, we identified a subset of genes whose expression, in the senescent state, is highly correlated with the number of divisions that the cells have undergone. We validated the expression of seven genes by real-time quantitative reverse transcription polymerase chain reaction. Senescence-associated gene expression profiles may provide insights into the mechanistic basis of the aging process.
