I have a button, when is clicked I want to force the un-subscribing of a handler. I have registered the handler in my constructor, which will be used by other classes as well and this handler has calls to different functions in some other classes. I want to force all classes to use only one single handler for the 'about' event and just unregister that handler on click of any button. Doing a.unsubscribe(..) on a handler will remove only that particular handler and will also cause the code to crash since it will try to unsubscribe from the event of a class which it has never been subscribed to. Another solution to this can be to store the handler in a class level variable and prevent the method from being called on the same object, but that would seem a less efficient way since it will be doing some very overhead on each call of that method. So how can this be resolved efficiently? A: Just call the unsubscribe() method on the event: button.addClickListener(new ClickHandler() { public void onClick(ClickEvent event) { MyHandler.unsubscribe(handler); } }); You can't call unsubscribe() on the button instance because you can't unsubscribe from a non-deliverable event, but you can use the generic type of the handler to call unsubscribe() from the handler instance. Alternatively, if you just want the handler to be removed from any other class instance then consider using the Key or AtomicReference classes to encapsulate the handler and allow it to be shared.
