This randomized controlled trial will compare two experimental interventions to an attention control group. In addition, the project will examine the feasibility of achieving intervention compliance, and of testing techniques to measure physical activity in the natural environment. Children will be randomly assigned to one of three study groups: 1) a group receiving a systematic exercise program in their schools, 2) a group being offered a free workout program, and 3) a control group receiving routine physical education classes only. In year 1, each group will be offered physical education classes four times per week (3 hr per session) during an academic year. The exercise intervention will include multiple skill disciplines including a moderate intensity exercise program, games and calisthenics. The free exercise program will be patterned after that recommended by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. The control group will continue with their traditional physical education classes (3 hr per session). In year 2, the experimental groups will be offered the same physical education programs in schools, with the addition of voluntary testing for 10 min before and after the program. The physical activity levels of the children will be recorded during the entire program. The project has been designed to help children to cope with the problems of sedentary behavior. Overall this study will increase understanding of the feasibility of recruiting children from across the school environment into appropriate, culturally-appropriate exercise programs and then testing the effects of these interventions on physical activity. PUBLIC HEALTH RELEVANCE: The objectives of this study are to increase understanding of the feasibility of recruiting children from across alcoholism are among the most costly public health problems in the U.S. today.

Treatment research in substance abuse has identified several factors that can serve as mediating processes in the development and maintenance of alcohol abuse. In the proposed study, the psychobiological processes of reward expectancy, self- regulation, and coping will be examined in a non-clinical sample as potential mediating processes.
Subjects (N = 160) will be adolescents with and without alcohol abuse problems. Specific hypotheses are: 1) that expectancy measures and self-regulatory variables will predict the number of drinks consumed prior to a situation that is (a) commonly used to elicit drinking episodes; and (b) represents the type of situation that the person believes is most likely to result in alcohol use. 2) that expectancy and self-regulatory variables will predict the extent to which an individual is able to control their alcohol use in that situation; and 3) that expectancy and self-regulatory variables will predict the extent to which an individual copes with the alcohol related cues following a negative expectancy experience. With the left's anti-gun agenda gaining momentum, it's no surprise that a prominent gun manufacturer is looking to get involved
