The Student Body The engineering engineering and science majors, in addition to course and career opportunities, are a relatively diverse group of individuals. They range from engineers and inventors (like the pioneers in science and engineering who helped build the railroad) to science teachers and the mathematicians who help create cutting-edge engineering design tools. It can be difficult for some students to meet other students who have interests that are different from their own. The Engineering Career Center looks for opportunities to help students do just that. That's why engineering departments hold student organizations, like the Society of Women Engineers, the Association of Women Engineers, the Engineering Society, and the Society of Hispanic Professional Engineers. These groups help create an environment in which students with diverse backgrounds can find people with similar interests and build friendships through their organizations. The engineering technology student organization, the Society of Electrical Engineers, has an array of student activities where members can find groups that share similar interests. One group conducts research on solar energy. Another group looks at infrastructure solutions that are safe and reliable. Another looks at ways to automate the creation of new energy products and services. The Urban and Community Development program helps students seek out internships that fit their career goals and interests. Students who intern in the program are in the best position to find their next job. For instance, a student interning in the financial services field, which is an area that's growing and there are opportunities in each of the regions of the city, has a better shot at landing a position after graduating.],[@ref46],[@ref47]\].
