Umgmmm, nikki09 said: I'm sure my mom would love to see this. But she's a huge pervert and would use the camera to watch me have sex. She does love her grand-kids, but she's also very promiscuous and likes to watch porn and get off with her married boyfriend (it's this old pervert I told you about before who I've dated and he and my mom are both kind of obsessed with sex) She keeps a camera with her at all times too. My oldest son is currently going through the house naked (I suspect he has a camera too) She also snoops through his stuff constantly, even if I have my back turned. It's an older house too so there is a lot of sex going on, but I can only hope that if she's spied on him doing something, then he won't be mad. I suspect he's done it before, but I'm not really sure. I also have a brother who is the same way, and another guy (who's also my room-mate) has a habit of going through peoples' drawers in the house to steal lingerie, but I think he was caught doing this and is a bit more careful now, but still will check out my brother's drawers when he feels like it. It's all a bit awkward and makes me a bit nervous, but my parents are clueless

The way I'm seeing to do this is by creating these subdomains as separate django projects with their own urls.py and settings.py. The main site would have urls of format /{something}/, and each additional subdomain would have its own urls of say /{something}/newfeature. The problem I'm having is that when I go to the main site of /example.com/something/, I actually want the browser to show it to be /example.com/something/newfeature. When I go to the other subdomain, I actually want it to show up as /example.com/specialfeature/ instead. I thought that I could accomplish this with the HttpResponseRedirect and TemplateResponseRedirect, but I'm not seeing how I should use them to get the desired result. A: With the TemplateResponseRedirect you could check which subdomain the user is on: from django.utils.http import http_error, TemplateResponse def redirect(request, *args, **kwargs): if request.META['HTTP_HOST'] == '79a2804d6b
